Semiconductor devices are used in a variety of electronic applications, such as personal computers, cell phones, digital cameras, and other electronic equipment, as examples. Semiconductor devices are typically fabricated by sequentially depositing insulating or dielectric layers, conductive layers, and semiconductive layers of material over a semiconductor substrate, and patterning the various material layers using lithography to form circuit components and elements thereon. However, some semiconductor applications, such as the manufacture of electronic devices including radio frequency (RF) power amplifiers (PA), have a higher-than-anticipated need for signal loss. For example, in an RF PA or other circuit there are multiple metal layers that are electrically connected together. As devices continue to shrink, the layers that are electrically connected together have been integrated together to form a single, multi-layered structure. A problem with these types of devices is that signal loss typically increases as the number of layers is increased. Accordingly, the use of metal layers in these devices may have a negative effect on the performance of the device. What is needed in the art is a multi-layered structure with improved signal loss.[Optimization and validation of a multiplex RT-PCR test for prenatal diagnosis of CMD1-related diseases]. To optimize and validate a multiplex RT-PCR for prenatal diagnosis of CMD1-related diseases. CMD1 DNA fragment was amplified with PCR primers designed based on the difference of nucleotide sequences between CMD1 and CMD2. The multiplex RT-PCR method was optimized by testing the relevant concentrations of reagents in the reaction system. The multiplex RT-PCR was validated for detection of 15 pregnant women carrying normal and abnormal fetuses. The fetal DNA was extracted from dried blood spots and was detected with multiplex RT-PCR f678ea9f9e
